Charles Frederick Worth was the most celebrated fashion designer of the 1800s. He was born in 1825 in Bourne, Lincolnshire, one of five siblings. His father abandoned the household by the time he was 11, leaving them extremely poor. His mother was left with no other option but to find an apprenticeship for him at a printer's shop, but the young boy hated the labor. He persuaded his mother to allow him to move to London to gain a new position at Swan & Edgar, a clothing store situated in the newly built Regent Street. There, he was given the chance to handle various fabrics, which gave him an excellent foundation for the future. Perhaps just as significant were his regular trips to the recently opened National Gallery, a short walk from Swan & Edgar. Worth's understanding of costume history, gained from observing portraits in the National Gallery, was greatly beneficial to his career.

Charles Lyell (1797-1875), best known as the author of Principles of Geology, was born in Scotland to a wealthy family, the eldest of ten. When he was quite young, he moved with his family to Hampshire in southern England, where he luxuriated in nature and collected moths.

(A) He became Secretary of the Geological Society of London in 1823 and served as its president for two terms, traveling widely and studying geology not only in England but in France, Sicily, the Alps, the Canary Islands, and North America (from Nova Scotia to the Mississippi Delta).

(B) At Exeter College, Oxford, he studied under Professor Buckland but became disappointed with his mentor's biblical interpretations of geology. After earning his bachelor's degree in the classics, Lyell pursued law, but his eyesight was weak, and law studies were difficult.

(C) Although he was called to the bar in 1822 at Lincoln's Inn, his father's financing allowed him to pursue his childhood love of nature and geology. Lyell was also influenced profoundly by Hutton's research and writings, advancing the theory of the gradual change of the Earth.

Lyell was influenced profoundly by Hutton's research and writings but was more interested in the Earth's history than in its origin, noting that one did not need to know the origin of humankind to write about the history of a nation. He observed no difference between the present and past processes, recognizing that the Earth was a stable system, and thus he advanced Hutton's theory of uniformitarianism and the gradual change of the Earth over vast periods.

During World War II, Beltrami studied medicine while quietly helping the French Resistance. From 1942, he served as a messenger and provided clinical support to individuals in distress. He also risked his life by offering his residence as shelter to Jewish individuals, deeds for which he was later honored as Righteous Among the Nations by Yad Vashem in 1984. After the war, he dedicated himself to enhancing medical availability in disadvantaged communities, founding clinics in countryside regions of southern France. He passed away on November 12, 1991, leaving behind a heritage of gentleness and bravery.
